

U.K. Election Fight

turned to Britain on Wednesday night, he immediately and in great detail repeated his denial and nullified the rather sophisticated argument and suggestion he had actually put to President Johnson, about Britain's proper role as a conventional armed power, capable because of its naval tradition of putting out local "break free".

Mr. Wilson, satisfied by the qualified nature of the Prime Minister's withdrawal, made it known he would change the Prime Minister to subordinate his statement or apology. An hour or two later, Sir Alec began a second speech to the Tory leaders in the House of Commons. This afternoon that he had made no such speech and, of course, it immediately and severely withdrew what I had said. I thought, when he said that "Mr. Wilson goes to the United States and makes a great speech on behalf of the Socialist party, suggesting that they are going to take some new initiative by putting the British Navy at the disposal of the United Nations."

Mr. Wilson then welcomed and gladly accepted Sir Alec's statement and added: "From now on I am sure that all will agree that the nation will benefit in this election period of public controversy is confined to our respective policies."

Mr. Wilson then said: "He calculated he will get headlines and make a great impression and no one will question it. And someone has questioned it. He has come back and say it meant nothing at all. This is the kind of technique he uses time and again. We must expose him every time he uses it."

While Sir Alec was making this speech, Mr. Wilson was addressing Labor members of the House of Commons. But when he read reports of the Prime Minister's remarks, he returned to London in time for the Prime Minister's question time in the House of Commons, respectfully waiting with anger. At the first available opportunity, he rose and said he intended to call on the Prime Minister to withdraw his statement.

"I do not know what the right honorable gentleman said in Washington," said Sir Alec in reply. "I dare say one of us will ever know what did happen."

The Weather

Public Weather Bureau's forecast:
Synopsis: The deep low pressure area that brought record-breaking temperatures, heavy showers and very strong winds to most of Quebec yesterday now is off the Labrador coast heading toward Greenland. Clearing has already taken place in western regions with cold drizzle air coming down from the northwest. Winds will normally decrease during the day. A weak disturbance over the Great Lakes is moving east and will reach Quebec tomorrow morning. It will bring cold and some light snow to most forested regions. The amount of snow expected will be between one and two inches in northern regions and quite light in southern regions. Temperatures should moderate tomorrow.

Regional forecasts valid until midnight tomorrow:
Montreal, Ottawa and Laurentian regions: Sunny today, mainly cloudy with a few flurries tomorrow, clearing in late afternoon, not quite so cold; winds westerly 20 becoming light this afternoon.

CHARTER

the charter service scheduled for 1962.
According to IATA sources, Manicougan hydroelectricity about 414,100 passengers flew by charter during 1963 compared with 2,422,267 on regular North Atlantic routes. The charter flight figures are expected to drop after all flights are recorded for the 1964 season, but they will vary. Some individual air lines may set different rates — depending upon type of aircraft and what time of the year the charter flight is taken.
